Barāwa is a place, a road and an invitation

Siddhartha Gauthama, the Buddha, once pointed out the virtues of respecting one another and refraining from disputes, of rejecting the proposition of being like water and oil, i.e. repelling one another, but mingling instead in the manner of milk and water.

Barāwa is designed with fidelity to this philosophical proposition, the concept of oneness, of co-existence and harmony and the superior endeavour that is collective effort.

The Buddha also pointed out that one can make one of two mistakes along the road to the truth; not going all the way and not starting.

Barāwa is a commitment to avoid both errors. It is a start. The road is long. It is not a Sri Lankan project. It is global. There is room in it for everyone who wants to belong Belonging, really, is a privilege. And a responsibility. This is therefore an invitation to share.
